

Fluidity and Resistance

My name, our names our but the minds feeble attempt to grasp and categorize in order to remember. A name is nonexistent. It is but a persona, a figment of our imagination, if anything we are named after the actions we commit, though the actions only define us at that point in time.

So to say I am Red Wolf, is to say that who ever I defined or others defined Red Wolf, to is that persona. If I was to leave that group and go to another group and say my name is Fox, they will accept me as such, not because of who I was but who I am perceived to be at that moment in time.

Today I am Red Wolf, tomorrow I am may be someone else and yesterday I was surely who made me who I am or am not today. Freedom begins with the abolishment of titles, autonomy begins with the understanding that your name or title only serves towards classification, which restricts your ability to transcend.

To put a name to us is certainly to hand over the keys to our freedom. To box us into a group, that which can be isolated, killed and destroyed. Even social categorization is meant to limit through social normalcy. To say that she is my wife or that he is my husband is to limit the potential of the relationship. Because both have already been defined in its absoluteness and thus constricts our perception to only what we've been thought by the social norms to exist in. Which in itself limitates what the mind sees as right and wrong, therefore limitating the possibility the possibility of a more organic relationship.

Fluidity gives us the ability to not state titles but intentions, such as we are lovers, which constricts the mind to what comes with in the context of what lovers are. Rather our intentions are to love each other, giving us space to grow in our own highstate of what loving another might be. This therefore frees us from the construct of gender roles, machismo or overt sexualization. Whos to say that either wants or needs to be the dominant or submissive or that we in-fact need to be in a soley monogamous relationship. Isn't love enough? In this society it isn't one must be the wife or must be the husband, one must be the dominant while the other submissive. One must be the strong, while the other....well you get my point.

Fluidity teaches that neither is expected, only that we be who we are at our highest ability. Without the expectation of what anyone else wants us to become. Fluidity gives us the ability to experiment without recourse, challenge our way of thinking or current social norms without being shunned due to committing to one ideology or another, schools of thought and or principles. This is not to say that anarchy isn't fluidity, only that the moment it isn't is when we begin to categorize and sub-categorize it beyond what anarchy is...freedom.
